‘How will people feed themselves?’ Farmers Across Europe Protest Policies They Say Will Put Them Out of Business

European farmers and their tractors descended on the European Union Parliament Summit in Brussels last week to protest “net zero” and other government policies they said threaten their livelihoods. Author Seamus Bruner told The Defender the “controligarchs” want to take over the global food system.

At least 1,300 farmers from across Europe lined the streets of Brussels with their tractors at the annual summit of European Union (EU) leaders on Feb. 1 to protest policies they claim threaten to put them out of business, according to Bloomberg and other news sources.

The latest demonstration against restrictive “net zero” and other government policies gained traction over the past week as owners of small and family-owned farms from France, Spain, Italy, Portugal, Germany, Poland, the Netherlands, Great Britain and other EU countries made their way to Belgium to surround the EU Parliament headquarters building.

The mostly peaceful protest was punctuated by police deploying water cannons and shooting rubber bullets, and by farmers breaking through barricades to throw eggs and set off fireworks, small fires and smoke bombs, according to Zerohedge. The farmers also toppled a statue, France24 reported.

Jose Maria Castilla, representing a Spanish union, said, “We want to stop these crazy laws that come every single day from the European Commission.”

Belgian Prime Minister Alexander De Croo, who met with the protesters, said it was important to listen to the farmers and promised to add their concerns to the summit agenda, according to PBS. “They face gigantic challenges,” De Croo said.

The protests came as EU leaders discussed — and passed by a vote of 27-0 — the latest $50 billion aid package for Ukraine.

Jean-Francois Deflandre, a farmer in Halle, a town near Brussels, lashed out at European Commission President Ursula von der Leyen for having “the audacity to go to Kyiv” but not having “the courage to come and see us,” The Associated Press reported.

“If you see … how many people … are here today, and if you see it's all over Europe, … you must have hope,” said Belgian farmer Kevin Bertens, adding, “You need us. Help us!”

‘It's an all-out war on farmers’

Farmer protests have been brewing across Europe for the past several months, with France currently the epicenter of the revolt.

Farmers last week blocked roads around Paris, burned tires and spread manure and straw in the foyers of administrative buildings. They later won some concessions from the government, including tax breaks, financial support and a crackdown on unfair competition.

The government of the Netherlands first lit the fuse for current tensions by attempting to impose “voluntary” buyouts or seize farms outright under a climate policy to cut carbon and nitrogen emissions.

The Dutch farmer revolt against such policies — including plans to cut the country's livestock production in half — goes back to at least 2019.

Lorcan Roche Kelly, editor at Irish Farmers Journal and a former cattle farmer from Ireland — where the government wants to cull 200,000 cattle — said on Bloomberg's Odd Lots podcast that a combination of factors has made many EU farmers furious. These factors include climate obligations, economic conditions, government regulation and free trade deals.

Zerohedge said farmers were protesting against having to “finance a so-called ‘green agenda.’”

Seamus Bruner, author of “Controligarchs: Exposing the Billionaire Class, their Secret Deals, and the Globalist Plot to Dominate Your Life,” said the uprisings are a direct result of efforts to control the global food system by elites working through institutions like the EU Parliament, the United Nations (U.N.) and the World Economic Forum (WEF).

“It's an all-out war on farmers by multinational agricultural conglomerates under the guise of saving the planet,” Bruner told The Defender. The war is primarily targeting “the small-scale, smallholder, family-owned farm industry,” he said.

Farmers are rising up against “net zero” and Agenda 2030,” Bruner said, citing policies ranging from fertilizer restrictions to methane reductions that are causing small farmers to run their businesses at a loss.

Companies that have the most to gain by shutting down small farmers include Yara, Royal Dutch Shell, Bayer and Dow Chemical, according to Bruner. All are partners with the WEF and claim to have climate-change solutions like climate-friendly fertilizers and cow flatulence vaccines while being among “the biggest earth polluters,” he said.

“These are not political issues” for farmers or for the people of the world, Bruner said. “These are existential issues.”

‘You control the food, you control the people’

Bruner conceded that the globalists are pushing precision fermentation and insect and fake meat proteins. But he said their No. 1 goal is to “transfer power and control away from countries, away from individuals towards international institutions and corporations they control.”

“You control the food, you control the people,” he said. “And when they put your local farmer out of business and replace it with a factory farm owned by a multinational corporation, you don't have control over your food system anymore.”

The prime strategy of the “controligarchs” is to buy up or create patentable products and turn them into requirements for participating in global food production, according to Bruner.

“A patent is like a monopoly,” Bruner said. “So they want to force us into a controlled food system with patented proteins, patented GMO [genetically modified organism] seeds and patented fertilizers, where they own all the patents and they get all the profits.”

Companies like Impossible Foods and Beyond Meat have dozens, if not hundreds, of patented proteins, he said.

Controlling agricultural production standards is another way globalists are working to take over the food system. Bruner cited the “Leading Harvest Farmland Management Standard certification,” calling it “a signal that you're going to comply with the World Economic Forum and Agenda 2030 climate goals.”

“And that's very expensive, so local farmers will not be able to compete and will go out of business,” Bruner said.

Bill Gates, who has bought thousands of acres of farmland in the U.S. and is investing in agrochemical companies, is sure to adhere to the standard, Bruner said.

This is part of Gates' and the globalists' “embrace, extend and extinguish (or exterminate) strategy” — the same approach he used to put competitors out of business when he ran Microsoft, said Bruner, who called Gates “at core a cutthroat capitalist and monopolist.”

Bruner called the recent headline claiming the carbon footprint of homegrown food to be 5 times greater than conventionally grown food “absurd” and just another salvo in the war on small-time food production.

“The people who are talking about carbon footprints and telling you that your carbon footprint is too high, rest assured, theirs is higher than yours,” he said.

How will people feed themselves?

Writing about the Brussels farmer protests on Feb. 1, Substack author and The HighWire reporter Jefferey Jaxen compared green agenda policies to Mao Zedong's disastrous Great Leap Forward that sought to collectivize Chinese farming beginning in 1958.

That effort resulted in a reported 30 million deaths from malnutrition and starvation before it was scrapped in 1961.

Jaxen cited an article by Alex Newman exploring the roots of current globalist “sustainability” ideology and the war on farmers. Newman, who found a section of the U.N.'s 1976 Vancouver Declaration to be particularly enlightening, wrote:

> “The agreement stated that ‘land cannot be treated as an ordinary asset controlled by individuals’ and that private land ownership is ‘a principal instrument of accumulation and concentration of wealth, therefore contributes to social injustice.’
> “‘Public control of land use is therefore indispensable,’ the U.N. declaration said, a prelude to the World Economic Forum's now infamous ‘prediction’ that by 2030, ‘you'll own nothing.’”

A more recent paper, “The Future of Urban Consumption in a 1.5°C World,” published in 2019 by the University of Leeds, ARUP and C40 Cities, contains “progressive and ambitious targets for ‘food consumption interventions’ which involve a strict 2,500 calorie limit per day for each citizen and zero meat and dairy,” Jaxen wrote.

With the implications of shutting down local farmers and controlling food systems globally, Jaxen asked, “How will people feed themselves?”

He predicted that innovations in the “creeping” synthetic food industry would be insufficient “to easily replace the mass, global reduction of farms at the speed being attempted.”

“Few explanations make sense unless viewed through the lens of depopulation, control, and societal consolidation using food as a weapon,” Jaxen said.

According to Bruner, the globalist elites are very open about their fears about “catastrophic overpopulation.” He cited Gates' goal to reduce global population by 10 or 15%, saying, “That's more than a billion people.”

“And it is certainly true that you are the carbon that these globalist elites want to reduce,” Bruner said.

Club of Rome member, Dennis Meadows, hopes the "necessary" depopulation of the planet, down to one billion—an 87.5% reduction from today's population—can "occur in a civil way".

“We know that profit is not their only motivation — there's certainly an ideological component to it,” Bruner said. “You look at whether it's Bud Light or Target — they can take a financial hit and still just be fine.”

The globalists do not have a drastic reduction target in mind, as Bruner sees it. “They're hoping to find a balance where they're still making enormous windfall profits and at the same time achieving their goals to reduce global population,” he said.

Forced food shortages, combined with inflation and neverending wars will likely lead to an economic crash, according to Bruner, after which the vulture capitalists can swoop in to buy whatever's left — including farms and food companies — for pennies on the dollar, leaving just a few corporations in control.

“That's the name of the game — causing booms and busts via Federal Reserve monetary and fiscal policies,” Bruner said. “They've been doing it for over a century.”

“They only want a handful of players,” he said, noting how consolidation has been happening in every industry from airlines and banks to food and telecommunications.

“Fewer choices means less freedom. And it means that these multinational corporations can push you around,” he said.

For humanity to regain its power, Bruner said the “problems caused by global forces must be combated at the local level.”

He said:

> “You have to get involved in your community. You need to be supporting your local businesses and voting with your dollars, making sure that you're not spending your money and funding your opposition.
>
> “Share news from independent sources to help wake people up to the lies of the mainstream media.
>
> “Get involved in your local school board meetings. Education is possibly the biggest area where we need to fight back.
>
> “It's going to be a long-term battle. But I'm optimistic, and the farmer uprising is giving me hope for the future.”

Tey tax carbon dioxide only because their original plan, to tax oxygen, proved too unpopular in market surveys. Now they're wanting to tax nitrogen.

Okay, maybe that's a bit of humour, but really these people are becoming obnoxious to share an atmosphere with.

What about the big heard (most herbivores) in Africa. they also happen to fart and burp.
What about Gates to Hell flying around the world in his 1600 liter kerosine jet.
IK, that might NOT deposit nitrogen.
That lady van der Leyden is as bad as the rest.

She most probably also has a few shares in big pHARMa.

So much in the article is about the farmers losing their livelihoods, but a bigger concern is that without them growing food, there won't be enough to eat for the world population. The Cabal has no feelings. They don't care if half the world dies painfully by starvation. The world will survive just fine without their interference.

I don't understand people like this who want to control everything and everyone. What's the point? Why can't they live their lives in their castles and let us live ours?

If people around the world want to stop "Climate Change," they had better start targeting and protesting the geoengineering programs (Solar Radiation Mitigation brought to you by the U. S. military since 1947). People had better come out of their comas, open their eyes, and start the real fight.

We'd better start fighting hard for this. The depopulation plans are playing out just as the elites have wanted it for years -- sterilization and death through vaccination just like the Jaffe Memo (1969) and the Kissinger Report in 1974 state. They don't even hide it any more. They realize that they have an opportunity and they are seizing the day!

Portraying farmers as putting healthy food on our tables is the same sponsored myth as autism being a natural variation and certainly not caused by vaccines. S.A.D. isn't it?
What is the big similarity here? Hidden sponsoring by Big Money, respectively -Ag and -Pharma.
Autism is a chemically induced handicap and non-organic farmers are poisoning you, not feeding you.

You are being conned by Big Ag. Wake up. Bill Gates buying American farmland is terrible, but it is a totally different thing to Europe regulating the poisons emitted by regular agriculture.
But then again, most readers here are American and they know ALL about Europe, don't they? They also know what's best for us (I'm Dutch). Not. (sarcasm, of course; get your own things in order, before arrogantly meddling in ours with typical American we-know-what's best-for-you, know-it-all-arrogance).
At the very least: get informed. Properly. Both sides of the story, Thank you.

Non-organic farmers are addicted to habits that are killing you.

Hi Alison
One of the reasons I voted against Brexit was because I believed the EU might be about to place a ban on glyphosate (they didn't and as far as I know haven't). My own view, and I suspect others here, irrespective of present practices is that this is a war for who controls the global food supply between a small unelected global elite (who aim either to starve us or feed us on industrial garbage of their own manufacture) and ordinary people, including farmers. So, while I greatly hope for the reform of farming practices I don't believe that this is what this is about: if independent farmers are driven from the land it will be a catastrophe. CHD has alway been strongly committed to organic methods, but at the moment Western governments are on course to collapse our food supply on a scale of one to two years. In the UK, for instance, it is quite easy to see how this has been planned by our governments in conjunction with the UN over many years in order to make farms (1) much less productive and (2) financially unviable. And now we are coming to the crunch.

Yes, the EU is corrupt and they didn't ban glyphosate. Yes, I am afraid that there is an ulterior globalist motive, that is sinisterly hovering behind these anti-Nitrogen measures. Thing is, I am not going to reject a good resolution (protect nature by forcing a reduction in nitrogen-emissions), because it is also being abused by powers-that-be.
My prime concern here is that we are in the middle of (I believe) the 6th mass-extinction, total ecosystem collapse and non-organic farming is one of the big culprits.

The only way to stop Big Ag and their puppet farmers is to regulate them, unfortunately. So, if that is what it takes, then that is what it takes.
Let's just take the 'we'll starve, if we don't mass poison everything' crap off the table. The only people who might starve are the non-organic farmers who are seriously addicted to their poisonous ways.

All eyes are being forcibly focused on a 'climate catastrophe', which I personally don't really believe is happening. In my humble opinion we are all being conned by an illusionist trick as old as Methusalem: if

I am opposed to using glyphosate WHEN possible. I'm constantly experimenting with other natural cocktails to control weeds. The issue with the farmers not having access to glyphosate is that they can't just abolish it from their farms overnight. They need time to establish regenerative methods and will need government assistance in doing so. But let's all get real and face the fact that the tyrants who are attempting to kill farmers have never given a crap about human health or global health. The climate initiative is a farce- a complete farce. The hypocrisy is so blatantly obvious when we step back and look objectively at how deliberately ineffective 'regulations' are while polluting us with toxins, EMFs, chemtrails, microplastics and microfibers from our synthetic clothing and cheap products, etc... Everything is being designed to entice or force people to purchase extremely expensive shoddy stuff that will cost us even more to constantly replace or maintain it.

Like you, I was opposed to Brexit because I knew that at the very least, it was a move to further harmonize the US with the UK. This has been in the works since GWB and there are some pretty bad actors at the helm. The UK has been encouraged to become more like the greedy USA-abolishing their healthcare system and more. I have many friends in the UK and in general, they don't have a realistic perspective of the USA like many immigrants who come here believing that there is endless opportunity. We may have a Disneyland but we are by far not one.

"if independent farmers are driven from the land"- they have long since been driven from the land and become enslaved to their Big Ag masters. The truly independent farmers are the small-scale organic farmers (kind of a tautology).
In Canada, where I used to enjoy working on bio-dyanmic farms, organic farms can't keep cows easily, because the quota have been bought up by large farming companies.
In the Netherlands, the current regulations heavily favour non-organic farming. I am a member of a local organic coop-farm. It is incredibly hard to get these things started. Et cetera.

Regular farmers are addicted to antibiotics for their livestock, fertilizer for their "earth"- if that's what you want to call the thing they destroyed, pest-control, friends in political places, et cetera. Being addicted is not being independent.

Many of these problems ought to have been sorted out years ago - not following the heavy handed model of Sri Lanka. But it is not credible to suggest that EU Commission is acting to protect human life, though they may like to virtue signal. They have other much more sinister motives. British farmers are just beginning to organise themselves under the banner "No farmers, no food", and frankly that is the bottom line.

I've wondered who it is who wants a global famine and why.

In past famines wealthy nations have been willing and able to help the third world. But if shortages are everywhere the third world will be competing with the developed world for whatever food is available. Let's just say that in a scenario like that, the resulting migration will be like this world has never seen and the migrants will all be pissed off with us. And rightly so.

"Forced food shortages, combined with inflation and neverending wars will likely lead to an economic crash, according to Bruner, after which the vulture capitalists can swoop in to buy whatever's left " 🤬

Excellent column covering broad angle of globalists attempts...and because of it, scary. It has been obvious to me since long time, that 'net zero' is not about climate. There are literally hundreds of scientific papers debunking emissions of CO2, CH3 role in climate change.

The idea of population control and use of 'climate change' has been develope by Club of Rome indeed, as pointed here. It was after collapse of USSR in 1990.
1991: "The First Global Revolution: A Report by The Council of The Club of Rome"- came after "The Limits of Growth". In it we can find first allusion to 'climate change' and top to bottom 'global government'. Check Wiki and Amazon as well ...you will find this report there.

EU and UK (in the latter farmland is under attack as well, just listen to news at UKcolumn) have become the testing ground for various ideas since some time, no doubt about it. Conflict in Ukraine created opportunity for push on steroids on : deindustralization, 'green deal- no fossil fuels', faster inflation, more debt (another, €50B loan with compounded intetest from private Central Bank).

It is terribly disappointing to observe police acting. These paid servants simply do not understand (or are just simpletons) that they will eat crickets as well. Pathetic 😯
